

Squirrel Nutcase, real name Nutley Berrytwig, is a fearsome rodent. Recently, Nutcase has been coercing other mammals into supporting Big Mag's campaign against the raptors.

Nutcase was highlighted as a trouble maker from an early age after destroying several birds' nests for fun, and during his youth he also regularly tormented the elderly bird and mammal population with volleys of acorns.

Last spring, Nutcase received an ASBO from the Junior Council of Rodents and was extradited to the pine forest where the birds of prey thrive. Despite support from Woodland Council Services, his behaviour showed no signs of improvement. It is believed that, brought about by boredom, Nutley continued to destroy more nests. One in particular belonged to the late partner of Hercules.

The young squirrel was belligerent about his actions and carried on with his desctructive behaviour. But it was during this time, whilst out digging up another squirrel's nuts, that Hercules paid Nutley a visit.

Miraculously, Nutley survived the attack, although it cost him the sight in his right eye and a layer of skin and fur from his arm. The end product is a very angry, disfigured and embittered rodent. Since that date, Squirrel Nutcase has sought revenge upon Hercules and the royalty that supported him.

It is our strong belief that Big Mag saw this as an opportunity to radicalise the squirrel, and has since taught Nutley how to manipulate other squirrels. In return for his allegiance, it is rumoured that Big Mag has promised the angry rodent the clipped body of Hercules
